were arraigning Felton in the Jefferson Market Police Court, Felton showed signs of nervousness for the first time since the shooting. He was vry pale and trembled a little, but said nothing to the Magistrate. There was a brief recital of the case, and then Magistrate Whitman held Yelton without bail to await the result of Roche's injuries.

Former Magistrate Wentworth appeared for Felton and asked that ball fixed. Bob Nelson, the professional bondsman and lifelong friend of Felton, had a representative in court ready to go the limit for the prisoner. The Magistrate said he would not take bail without the consent of the District-Attorney. Mr. Wentworth decided then to drop the matter, and Felton was taken to a cell in the court prison.

ALL A MISTARE, SAYS PRISONER.

In the cell he was seen by an Evening World reporter, and despite the fact that an hour before Roche is alleged to have identified him as the man who shot him persisted that it was all a mistake.

"I have just this to say to the newspapers," said Big Frank, "and it is what I have already told the police. The wrong man has been arrested in this matter. I did not shoot Roche at all. It was done by a man who is a well-known broker, but whose name I will not give. Everybody in the Tenderloin knows me for a peaceable man. Roche, on the other hand, is a bad man and a dangerous man. The idea that I would shoot at a guy like that is ridiculous."

Previous to Felton's arraignment in court there was a peculiar scene beside Roche's bed in the New York Hospital. Roche had persistently efused to admit that Felton shot him, but finally Felton was brought before him and he weakened.

"Am I going to die?" he asked.

"You are," said Detective Drennan. "And if you don't tell the truth some innocent man may suffer for this shooting. Now, here is Felton, and I want to know whether he is the man who shot you." Roche looked at Feiton and saluted him with a "Hello. Frank!" Felton made no response. He glared at the dying man with a look of awful hatred

"Frank," said Roche finally. "I want to be on the level in this matter. You shot me; but you had a right to shoot me." Turning to the detectives,

"He shot me, but he had to do it to save his own life. I would have shot to kill under the circumstances. That's all there is to it. Now, Frank, shake hands," and Roche held out a trembling hand, Felton disdained the offer. He refused absolutely to shake hands.

Roche kept his hand extended and, with tears in his eyes, said:

"Frank, we've been good pals and I want to shake hands. If I'm going to die, why, I want to quit on good terms with you."

Felton simply glared at the man, but would not take the proffered hand. He finally turned his back on Roche, and the latter sank back in the pillows again, apparently feeling very badly. Felton was then hustled away from court, and it was a little later that Roche gent for the Corone; and made his ante-mortem statement.

Every effort to make Rocae name his relatives failed. He said he had
